PRESERVED IN OIL

An eminent member of the Massachusetts Bar wrote us, "I want more of the photographs showing a lawyer with his hand in his own pocket. It may be an unusual pose, but my friends tell me it's a capital likeness and otherwise worthy of being preserved in oil."

If photographs of this kind appeal to you, the kind worthy of being preserved (in oil or otherwise), then surely you ought to take advantage of our skill and experience.

HOLLIS STREET THEATRE

SALUTATORY

In Lydia Lopokova (Lo-po-ko-va, accent on third syllable) and "The Young Idea," it is the managerial pleasure of Harrison Grey Fiske to present for the judgment of playhouse patrons in Boston, a st and a play of which novelty is almost an equally distinctive characteristic. Miss Lopokova has heretofore been known only as an exponent of the poetry of the dance, having come to America less than three years ago as the premiere of the Russian dancers, but she now takes her place as a star of the dramatic stage in a language of which, upon her arrival on our shores, she knew scarce three words. Feeling that the drama offered opportunities of far greater breadth than dancing—even the classical interpretative dancing in which she was supreme—ever could do, she set out to reach the greater heights, and if success is a reward of unflagging zeal and an arduous course of study, she will certainly achieve it. Naturally she builds high hopes upon her engagement in Boston, which is to precede a hearing in New York, and as no effort of player, author or producer can be complete without the fourth equation, that of the audience, it is hoped that that important factor may be as interested in the work of the new star, as she will be earnest in her efforts to win its approbation.

Another element of novelty and, the gods grant, of interest, associated with the engagement of Miss Lopokova, is that in "The Young Idea," Ethel Watts Mumford makes her first appearance as a writer for the stage, although her literary reputation in other directions is so well established that no encomiums upon her cleverness, originality and cheerful humor are necessary. In writing "The Young Idea" it was not her purpose to bring forth a soul-searching masterpiece of technique and emotionalism, but rather a play that will make life a little pleasanter, and the playhouse world a good one to live in. "Do you believe in fairies?"

Highways and Byways

ONCE upon a time, a little shop—filled with gems and wondrous sparkling things, sprang up, and became firmly established in a Byway of Boston.

It was dominated by a personality, and that must have counted with the people because success attended it.

It believed that patrons could not fail to recognize the better values made possible by the less expensive costs the Byways afforded.

Years—most a score, rolled by, yet here prospered the little gem shop for women—in a men's Byway.

The Personality was a wise one perchance. It knew that some of the most exclusive shops in the Old World hide in Byways and yet are eagerly sought out by traveler and native alike.

It knew that one of the most exclusive jewelry stores in old Manhattan is right now—A. D. 1914—almost at the threshold of Greenwich Village and miles from Fifth Ave. the highest of Highways.

In the midst of thriving cities even a Byway is not immune, and building progress threatened the little Gem Shop.—The personality—by now a synonym for distinctiveness in jewel-craft in the community—thus evicted by progress—did not rush out and plant its standard in broad highways.

The truth is, this Personality felt that it was part of an environment, and rather than leave the faithful Byway, it sought out what seemed to be the surest fixture in that Byway,—a Hostelry—named in distinct contradiction to its age,—and by its leave, has become a brother fixture in that Byway, under its hospitable roof and not a stone's throw from the old shop.

The personality reasons thus—"I am part and parcel of this location and because I have prospered and am now forced to edge along, is no reason for seeking the broad Highways when this dear old Byway has yielded me the staunch patronage it has.

"Rather than go I have yielded practically a half year out of business to find the means to stay in this picturesque Byway where I can serve my patrons best."

Associated with the Shepard Drapery Stores are artists designers and salesmen with ability to carry out your ideas, or ever ready to make suggestions and submit color schemes and estimates.

CRETONNES AND CHINTZES

We have English Cretonnes and Hand-Blocked Chintzes—a collection of special charm. Many of the patterns are confined to us in New England and some are ours for America.

We are making a most complete showing in both 50-inch and 31-inch widths—some printed on linens, others on cotton and taffeta.

Another advantage in choosing at Shepard Norwell Company is that you can see things in homelike surroundings in the series of Little Rooms devoted to fabrics for Curtains and Furniture Coverings.

We have many exclusive patterns.
